Melbourne's troubled West Gate Tunnel will finally be ready to welcome motorists on Sunday.

The project, which is three years overdue, provides another major road link between the city's booming western suburbs and the CBD.

In a post on social media site X, Premier Jacinta Allan confirmed the project would officially open on Sunday.

It comes after she repeatedly declined to confirm the date when asked about the tunnel on ABC Radio Melbourne earlier on Friday morning.

"We're working through the details and we'll confirm that date very soon," she said.

opened to foot traffic for a "discovery day" that saw 50,000 people walk through the tunnel.

The event was held despite protests from the United Firefighters Union (UFU) which claimed the tunnel had not undergone adequate safety checks.

The government and Major Road Projects Victoria dismissed those concerns and said the tunnel had been sufficiently tested.
